Certain pledged assets, including, but not limited to, initial public offerings, ETFs and shares in most mutual funds of fund families not previously held in the account, must be held in the account for at least 30 days before they can be included in the borrowing capacity calculation. If certain types of assets have not been held in the account for 30 days, then the amount you can advance from your line of credit, including on the initial funding of the line of credit, will be impacted.

Although a securities-based line of credit may be an attractive financing vehicle for your client's unique situation, there are also several specific considerations to keep in mind when deciding if it's the right option. Additionally, there are certain risks associated with securities-backed demand lines of credit which may not be associated with other types of financing. For example, a market downturn may cause additional collateral to be required or the repayment of amounts borrowed to be accelerated. In addition, in the event of an uncured margin call, your client's pledged securities may be liquidated. Such a liquidation may cause adverse tax consequences for your client.
